A Passion for Pines

I'm not sure how, when or why it happened; but at some point in my bonsai practice I began to have an affinity for and fascination with pines. Initially I guess this probably stemmed from seeing photos of magnificent traditional Japanese pine bonsai, usually two-needle black or five-needle white pines.

When we lived in San Diego the climate was very conducive to growing Japanese Black Pines (Thunbergii) because they are coastal pines and do best in a temperate climate. So I began to acquire and work with Black Pines and still have several of those trees here in Colorado, though they now spend the winters in our greenhouse. My understanding of Black Pines in those early days was pretty rudimentary, but I managed to keep them alive and do some basic design work.

Upon moving to Colorado, I wanted to learn more about native species, and I was intrigued by the potential to work with the amazing variety of pine trees that grow here: Ponderosa, Bristlecone, Lodgepole, Pinyon, Limber, and others. I was especially impressed with collected pines from the mountains (the Japanese term yamadori literally means "from the mountain"); and I wanted to acquire, learn more about and work with these trees. I knew that they behaved differently from my Black Pines, and I wanted to learn how to develop them as bonsai.

I first met Ryan Neil in Japan when he was still an apprentice to Masahiko Kimura in 2008, and we continued to follow his bonsai career when he returned to the States. After I saw him style a large pine at the 2012 ABS/BCI Convention here in Denver, I decided to take classes with him specifically to develop my knowledge of pine as bonsai. I am now in my third year of pine study with Ryan at Bonsai Mirai, his garden and studio; and those three years of study and hands-on practice have vastly expanded my understanding of pine horticulture and its relevance to their development of bonsai. In addition, I have experienced physical examples of pine bonsai at Mirai that I would never have imagined possible.

Since pines are, indeed, my primary bonsai passion, I'd like to share some of the basic fundamentals I have learned at Mirai as my contribution to the "president's choice" program at our July RMBS meeting. I hope that this presentation will be informative and will possibly inspire more of our members to explore the fascinating world of pines as bonsai.

On another note, I wanted to offer a couple of thoughts about our June panel discussion on the future of "American Bonsai." I received a few comments from members about the topic and the presentation. Most were positive, but a couple questioned whether this type of discussion is relevant and useful to all members.

I understand that many members look to our monthly meetings as opportunities to learn more about how to develop and care for their trees. That's important. But I believe that it's also important, from time to time, to challenge ourselves and to look at the bigger picture of what bonsai is and where it is going. That was the purpose of this discussion.

Based on my studies, I am convinced that there are some significant developments occurring in American bonsai, especially with collected material here in the West, and that these directions are challenging the traditional Japanese formulas and images that we have mimicked for a long time. Bonsai is a reflection of the environment from which the tree originates, and the culture within which it is developed. Both of those factors are different in the American West than they are in Japan.

In retrospect, I wish that we had included visual images in our discussion of American bonsai to make clearer some of the ideas that were presented. In the future, we will remember that bonsai is a visual art and must be presented accordingly.

July Program

President's Program

An annual event is the President's Program, which is always a surprise bonsai related topic chosen by that year's RMBS president. Not only entertaining, but quite informative. Tom is one of the society's accomplished bonsai artists and has numerous trees in his collection. He spent several years in southern California and has taken multiple classes from American Bonsai Artists such as Ryan Neil. In addition to a beautiful mountain home outside of Boulder, he built a very nice greenhouse. Please join us in July to see what bonsai tree or subject he will present.
